The proposed 'Population Regulation Bill, 2019', introduced in Rajya Sabha last week that calls for punitive action against people with more than two living children and making them devoid of all government services, may impact the poor in various ways, public health experts have said.

The private members bill introduced by the Member of Parliament Rakesh Sinha proposed disqualification from being an elected representative, denial of financial benefits and reduction in benefits under the Public Distribution System (PDS) for people having more than two children. The bill also suggests that government employees should give an undertaking that they will not procreate more than two children.

"Disincentives through denial of benefits under anti-poverty schemes such as subsidized food grains through the PDS will impact the poorest and most marginalized sections of the population and worsen their impoverishment," said Poonam Muttreja, Executive Director of the Population Foundation of India (PFI), calling the Bill "misguided" and a misreading of India's demographic trajectory.

The Economic Survey of 2018 points out that 'son meta preference' - the desire to have a male child - has resulted in 21 million "unwanted girls" in India. "Imposing a two child norm will add to the burden on women, by way of sex selective practices and forced sterilisations. This could result in a setback to population stabilisation efforts, as it happened during the emergency period in mid-1970s. The policy makers, MPs and the government should reaffirm India's commitment towards a rights based approach to family planning. The government should raise budgetary allocations in order to ensure expanded contraceptive choices for delaying and spacing births and better access and quality of health care for young people," said Muttreja.
